Centre of Excellence in Global Health Policy Development and Governance in China

Over the last fifty years, China's global health activities have included work with international agencies, the provision of international medical teams/aid to developing countries, and the development of multi-country collaborations; however, these activities are fragmented and inconsistent with its rapid socio-economic development, reflecting limited institutional capacity and the absence of an overall national global health strategy. The project aims to improve the host institutes' capacities in global health policy development and governance to become core centers of excellence within China capable of advising the government on the development of a national global health strategy and participation in global health governance and advising. This project will have multiple activities, including policy research; education, training and knowledge dissemination; policy consultancy, and capacity building. These activities will map global health policy development and governance patterns and identify China's contributions; summarize China's global health activities and lessons learned, and help to formulate a national strategy in global health; develop multi-stakeholder education and training programs to enhance the capacity for policy-makers, researchers, health care providers and students to formulate sound global health policies; disseminate the products of the centers to multiple stakeholders; and improve government officials' and researchers' capacity in global health in order to facilitate stronger participation in global health affairs.

Developing an Interdisciplinary Graduate Curriculum in Global Health at Duke University

To develop an interdisciplinary Master of Science in Global Health (MSc-GH) program at Duke University, to be administered by DGHI. The proposed MSc-GH program will target undergraduates, graduate and professional students and medical residents. Our goal is to produce well-rounded, informed and ethical leaders and inquirers poised to undertake cutting-edge research, effect policy change, and improve the quality of health services in a variety of settings. The program will achieve this goal by offering a carefully designed and flexible curriculum and access to faculty from many disciplines and Schools at Duke.

Developing an Interdisciplinary Graduate Curriculum in Global Health

The Duke Global Health Institute (DGHI) Framework program is developing a new Master of Science in Global Health (MSc-GH). This supplement will be used to develop online learning modules based on selected course content from this program and incorporate them into curricula at Duke's international partner institutions.

Center of Excellence in Prevention of Chronic Diseases in China

The George Institute in China will be establishing a new National Institutes of Health-supported research Center of Excellence (COE) in Beijing, China, to develop, implement and evaluate novel strategies for the treatment and prevention of cardiovascular diseases in China. The model proposed to NHLBI is to bring a group of leading Chinese and International institutions already active in cardiovascular disease research, prevention and treatment. Duke University has been invited to play a major role in the launching of the COE, for a duration of 5 years, with specific responsibilities such as an operational committee of the COE board, Duke to be represented on the steering committee meeting twice a year, participate in the China Rural Health Initiative (CRHI) under the COE, provide IRB review for the CRHI, participate in IRB capacity building for Chinese local partners and provide training in specific research topic in Beijing and local partner institutions.

Amsterdam Health & Technology Institute (AHTI)

The Amsterdam Institute for Global Health and Development launched the Amsterdam Health & Technology Institute (AHTI) in partnership with the Duke Global Health Institute (DGHI) and the city of Amsterdam. AHTI's mission is to improve health and achieve better quality health care at lower cost. They're establishing an infrastructure for their work, initiating projects, sharing best practices in clinical innovations and engaging in international faculty exchanges.

Global Health Policy Development and Government in China

GHSP-CS-OP3-02

Fudan University, funded by the United Kingdom Department for International Development aims to improve its capacities in global health policy development and governance to become a core center of excellence within China capable of advising the government on the development of national global health strategy and participation in global health governance.
