Title of Project: The development and empirical study of HIV/AIDS symptom management and integrated care strategies based on knowledge translation theory.

Project Goal: This study will investigate the development, policy background and current practice of China's prevention and control on HIV/AIDS followed by systematic reviews and evidence synthesis centering on symptom management and caring activities. Guided by "knowledge translation" and "evidence-based medicine", a model of knowledge translation and evidence informed decision-making on symptom management and integrated care will be established. This model will be validated and optimized by an empirical study. Thus, the effectiveness, feasibilities and appropriateness of the model will be explored, in PLWHAs' symptom and compliance improvement, physical and psychosocial health, and upgrading quality of life. An effective mechanism of PLWHAs' symptom management and integrated care, will become driving force and technological support in scientific and evidence-based relevant policies making.

Title of Project: Developing psychometrically sound tools to evaluate effectiveness of a stigma reduction intervention for East Africa.

Project Goal: Through development of theoretically grounded, culturally sensitive, linguistically relevant, gender-specific internalized stigma reduction interventions, it is possible to help women successfully self-manage internalized stigma so they can achieve a variety of beneficial health outcomes including living with HIV, engaging in care, adhering to ART, and having an optimized quality of life. The first step in intervention adaptation and development is to systematically adapt and validate measurement instruments, which demonstrate linguistic and cultural equivalence, in 280 women living with HIV in Rwanda and Tanzania (total n = 560).

Title of Project: A multi-site RCT of a stigma reduction intervention for HIV-infected women

Project Goal: In previous work, we implemented a feasible, acceptable, and effective video--based intervention, "Maybe Someday," aimed at reducing internalized stigma and improving self--esteem and coping self--efficacy in women living with HIV. We propose to use a repeated measures randomized wait--list control group design to compare those receiving the Maybe Someday to a wait--list control group to determine the intervention's ability to reduce stigma, improve coping self--efficacy and self--esteem, improve effective HIV prevention behaviors, and improve antiretroviral adherence with 240 women living with HIV infection in New York, NY; Washington, DC; Durham, NC; and Charleston, SC. We will test the following hypotheses: Compared to a wait--list control group: Hypothesis 1: Participants in the video intervention condition will report reduced internalized stigma, and increased coping self--efficacy and self--esteem, across racial and ethnic categories of participants at 30, 75, and 120 day assessment points; and Hypothesis 2: Participants in the video intervention condition will report improved HIV prevention behaviors and ART regimen adherence.

Title of Project: The Healthy Connections for Positive Living Project.

Project Goal: The purpose of the phase I project was (1) to develop a screening algorithm to predict retention in HIV-oriented medical care for patients at risk of dropping out of care after voluntarily enrolling and (2) to identify the variables and processes influencing retention in medical care among HIV-positive persons using a mixed-methods approach. Through competitive re-application, the phase II project was funded (1) to test a retention care coordination intervention comparing two durations and intensities of intervention among HIV-positive persons at high-risk of dropping out of HIV-oriented medical care after voluntarily enrolling. There was a no cost extension for the period of 9/1/2006 – 8/31/2007. There were 17 sites participating in phase I and 10 sites (of the original 17) were funded in phase II.

Title of Project: Testing the ARRM-E (AIDS Risk Reduction Model – Expanded) in Men who have Sex with Men

Project Goal: The purpose of this project was to empirically test, using confirmatory factor analysis and structural equation modeling, an expanded version of the AIDS Risk Reduction Model among urban men who have sex men. The expanded model placed sexual risk behaviors in the context of urban men's lives and included childhood sexual abuse, gay identity, battering victimization, HIV alienation and cue-to-action triggers.
