Dr. Philip Rosoff is both a pediatrician and the chair of the Ethics Committee at Duke University Hospital. He routinely gives talks on medical ethics during critical care rounds, and his point of view will be interesting to any medical students or aspiring premeds. On a broader, more global scale, Dr. Rosoff has developed methods for health care rationing in periods of scarcity. This includes planning for pandemic influenza and distributing drugs during shortages.

Much of his clinical work is focused on childhood cancer. He describes that “it is a joy to care for children and extremely rewarding to see people grow up and be successful in their lives.” We’re excited to hear about it from him!
